Thirteen year-old Iain appears to be an everyday student in her Jr. High, but the week after her classmate commits suicide, she receives an e-mail from the dead student:

Soon, we find Iain experiencing what may be the merging of the real world of the flesh, and the wired world of the computers.

Accela

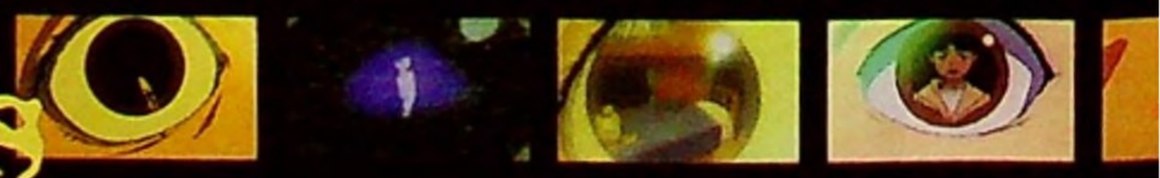

An "accelerator" is a unit that enhances a computer's processing speed when installed in the CPU. If such acceleration is possible in a machine, how about a human being? Would it be possible to accelerate the processing speed of the brain so much that you feel the movements of others has slowed?

See the world through Iain's eyes.

Iain appears to have two pupils. Do they dialate differently if she is looking at the real world or the wired world?

Awarded the Excellence Prize of the 1998 Media Arts Festival by Japan's Agency for Cultural Affairs: "This work... explores the often fuzzy borders between the wired and the real worlds. We were impressed with its willingness to question the meaning of contemporary life as it depicted the development of the computer and the ways in which real people live... the questions this work asks are extremely philosophical and deep."
